

VIOLA FORMAN GETS TEMPORARY ALIMONY FROM HUSBAND.

HER LAWYER GETS SOME, TOO

Proceedings attended by some very exciting controversies — Long-standing Walsh divorce suit settled by woman getting verdict.

Judge Lynch had an exciting time in his court yesterday keeping contending lawyers in the Forman case from getting at one another. The case of Louis H. Forman against Viola Forman was up on an order to show cause why the husband should not pay his wife alimony pending the suit, and also counsel fees. Mrs. Forman is being sued for divorce on the grounds that she had another husband living at the time she was married to Forman. The complaint had also alleged that she had "doped" him and he did not know what he was doing at the time he married her. This latter part of the complaint was withdrawn yesterday during the hearing on the order to show cause. The woman has a cross-complaint in which she charges desertion Feb. 17 last, less than three months after their marriage. Joseph McCaffery represented Forman and Alexander Mackel appeared for the woman.

From the turnhouse the attorneys were in a wordy war, and it looked at times as if they might have to be pulled apart. Judge Lynch had his attention divided between listening to the testimony and ordering the lawyers to cease hostilities. At one time, when the court called time, Mr. McCaffery started to apologize, remarking that he couldn't help what he did, as "it was Mackel's way." Mr. Mackel retorted that he did not have to learn from the counsel on the other side how to conduct himself. Toward the close of the hearing, both attorneys got on their feet at once and began a wordy and rather noisy combat.

Judge Has to Administer.

"Here, this is not a justice court," exclaimed the judge; "but you act as if you thought it was."

At another point, while Mrs. Forman was being cross-examined, Mr. McCaffery brought out something that he thought suited the side of his client. He smiled.

"I wish you wouldn't grin," remarked the witness.

"Well, there's no law against it," remarked the attorney.

Mrs. Forman testified that she had no means to live on, and that her expenses were about $75 or $80 a month. She said she owned a ranch which was left her by a former husband who is dead, and a small house that brought in a few dollars a month. The revenue from the ranch was eaten up taking care of the mortgage on the place. She admitted that her husband had been providing her with the means for living since the suit was filed.

Forman testified that his business had been established recently, and while he had plenty of work and employed several journeymen painters, his income had not been up to his expenses since he began trying to establish the business.

Judge Lynch allowed the woman $10 a month alimony and $100 counsel fees.

Louis N. Forman and his wife, Viola Forman, have kissed and made up and now they join in opposing the payment of a fee to Mrs. Forman's attorneys, Mackel & Meyer, which had been ordered by the district court. After Forman had instituted his suit for divorce the court ordered him to pay a temporary fee to his wife's attorneys of $100. He paid $50 on the account and then made up with his wife and dismissed his suit. Mackel & Meyer then brought proceedings to have him cited into court to show cause why he has not paid the remaining $50 on the fee. Forman and his wife filed affidavits yesterday in which they recite the fact that they are living together again and do not need the services of an attorney any longer. They also say Forman is not able to pay the fee and they ask the court to modify the original order so as to let him off with the payment of the $50 he has already made.
